

Alabama Tornado

When the twister roared down the street with its 170-mph winds, “the house exploded,” Kidd said.

A woman walks through the rubble of destroyed homes after two deadly tornadoes in Bearegard, Ala. (Shannon Stapleton/Reuters)

It's not over

- After 20 minutes of tracking the funnel's every move, it becomes clear to Johnson and his team that the twister has finally disappeared. But the threat's not over.
- "We have another storm about to move over the exact same areas that were just hit," Snitil says.
- This would go on to produce another large tornado that would churn, at times, only a mile south of the path left by the first.

Residents search for belongings amid devastation in Bearegard, Ala. (Joe Songer/AL.com/AP)
